In these times of economic insecurity, ask any South Korean worker what they fear and you might be surprised as we were as a majority were concern with political talks of reunification with the North.

Many Southerners explain that millions of new, hungry workers flooding into an overheated economy would reduce wages and destroy the standards of living of the workforce in the South.

There was a time, when the economy was booming, wages raising due to a worker shortage and there was a dream of unification, one Korea and the need to rejoin families separated by generations of war and politics.

This time is best represented by a now abandon World Heritage Site (minus a gift shop and valet parking) in an industrial park along Seoul's Riverwalk.

The site represented these dreams of a new dawn for the Korean

People that is, now, faded and overgrown with weeds.

What this means and the lesions to be made are far beyond my paygrade.
